Founders of Bioethics International Congress Brochure Statement

Contemporary medicine became American Medicine after World War II, when the federal government invested enormous economic resources in medical research. Government supported research created a continuing stream of new medicines, procedures and technologies, all of which raised ethical questions about their proper use or discontinuation of use. Multiple ethical questions generated differences of opinion among physicians and sometimes conflicts between physicians and patients or patient families. This was the background context from which evolved contemporary medical ethics that came to be called Bioethics.

Bioethics became a new academic discipline in the late 1960s and early 1970s. The founders or original contributors to the discipline of bioethics are still active academically. The Bioethics Conference at Edinboro University is designed to provide an opportunity for medical students, physicians, and all professional persons working in healthcare to have personal contact with the founders. More concretely, the Conference is designed to help healthcare professionals to understand the historical background of the ethical issues that they confront in clinical practice and to learn the best ways of handling these issues. Additional practical benefit will come from personal interaction with recognized experts on the different areas of bioethics.

Everything changes. Bioethics is no exception. What in bioethics has changed? What has remained the same? What is on the horizon? Meeting with, listening to, and having conversations with the founders of bioethics on the core issues of the discipline will prepare professionals in attendance to handle today's ethical challenges and those which they will meet in the future.

All professional persons attend academic meetings, but this Conference is meant to provide an important historical perspective, impart ethical directives for better practice, and to be a personal experience. It will leave a mark on those in attendance; both presenters and participants. Don't miss this opportunity to advance clinical competencies and to be involved in history!
